

Puberty, Relationships, Sexuality & Autism

Registration: 8.45 AM

Seminar begins: 9.15 AM

Seminar concludes : 3.30 PM

Course Description

This course will provide participants with information regarding how autism may impact on the experience of puberty, relationships and sexuality for students. In addition, participants will also be provided with strategies to support students during this period of their development.

Anticipated Outcomes

Participants will :

- Gain an understanding as to how autism may impact on an individual's experience of puberty, relationships and sexuality
- Gain an understanding of the difference between sexual and sexualised behaviours
- Know how to improve relationships between parents, teachers and professionals to create resources for teenagers with autism
- Have an awareness of how values and beliefs may affect delivery of relationship and sexuality education
- Gain an understanding of how to support individuals during instances of sexually inappropriate behaviour (reactive strategies), as well as strategies to assist young people before sexually inappropriate behaviours are displayed (proactive strategies)
- Gain an understanding of how young people with autism may be vulnerable to abuse, particularly when they are online
- Discuss how to develop an autism specific sexuality and relationships education for their organisation

Course Outline and Content

This course will emphasise that the physical and sexual development of young people with autism tends to be similar to the development of their typically developing peers; nevertheless, young people with autism may lack the social know-how in relation to managing their personal needs.

Consequently, young people with autism may be particularly vulnerable to abuse or may display sexually inappropriate behaviours. Participants will be supported to consider the difficulties faced by young people with autism during this developmental stage and will be provided with a range of proactive and reactive strategies to aid young people in developing greater independence in managing their behaviour.
